

All the News Without Fear or Favor

The CAMBODIA DAILY

Volume 64 Issue 81

Tuesday, June 21, 2016

2,000 riel/50 cents

PM Defends Sea Stance After Summit Breakdown

BY KUCH NAREN
THE CAMBODIA DAILY

Prime Minister Hun Sen yesterday defended his strict hands-off policy toward territorial disputes in the South China Sea following news reports that his government scuttled yet another proposed joint statement from Asean on the issue.

Following a meeting of Asean foreign ministers and their Chinese counterpart in China's Yunan province last week, news reports emerged citing anonymous diplomats who claimed that Cambodia, Burma and Laos forced the recall of a joint statement by withdrawing their support for it.

According to the reports, the statement expressed "serious concerns over recent and ongoing developments" in the sea, where China is turning shallow reefs into artificial islands with landing strips in

Continued on page 7

Siv Channa/The Cambodia Daily
Members of Phnom Penh's Boeng Kak community hold a vigil yesterday evening to mark the seventh 'Black Monday' since four human rights workers and an election official were jailed on bribery charges widely seen as politically motivated. (Story page 3)

Live From Facebook, It's the Prime Minister

In latest social media salvo, Hun Sen engages users with hit TV

BY BEN PAVIOUR
AND KUCH NAREN
THE CAMBODIA DAILY

It was the closing minutes of the second season of The Voice Cambodia, and Cambodians across the country were glued to their screens, watching confetti rain down on the finalists' carefully coiffed hair.

As winner Thel Thai shot the cameras a pinched smile and accepted his $25,000 loot, 19-year-old law student Kheng Ratha sat in her Phnom Penh apartment near O'Russey market on Sunday night, watching the spectacle on her smartphone.

The show—a smash-hit for broadcaster Hang Meas HDTV—was also streaming to thousands of viewers from an unlikely source: Prime Minister Hun Sen's Facebook page.

"I live in a rented apartment, and there is no TV, so I watch shows and news with my laptop or smartphone," Ms. Ratha said yesterday, adding that the premier's page offered unfiltered insight.

"I think his page is now a news channel that we can use to get messages from him directly, not from other officials' mouth," she said.

As the prime minister's Facebook fandom has grown—he now claims over 4.4 million likes, up from two million in January—so too has the diversity of his Facebook offerings.

Average-Joe photographs of Mr. Hun Sen—on a beach, a golf course, an airplane, at home, or just about anywhere he goes—

Continued on page 2

Veteran Boeng Kak Activist Back in Court Over Attack

Page 6

cambodiadaily.com

THE FORTUNE TOWER

SOHO & OFFICE

Discount up to 8% | 3 Years Leaseback Guarantee

LUCKY DRAW RECEPTION
"BE THE OWNER AND WIN A CAR"
26. 06. 2016 @ 5:00PM - 8:30PM

☎ 023 2222 08 / 023 2222 09    📍 Olympia City Sales Center, Olympic Stadium, Sam Povmeas Round, Sangkat Veal Vong, Khan 7Makara, Phnom Penh, Cambodia

🌐 www.olympiacity.net    📄 Olympia City

AND ALSO

Hymen-Based Funding Popped

REUTERS

A controversial scheme offering university scholarships to young South African women who remain virgins is unconstitutional, the Commission for Gender Equality ruled on Friday.

The “maiden’s bursaries” offered by a local mayor sparked a nationwide debate in January, with critics slamming the scheme’s emphasis on virginity as outdated while traditionalists said it would help preserve African culture.

On Friday, the gender commission said the program discriminated against women because male students were not subjected to the same tests.

“Any funding by an organ of state based on a woman’s sexuality perpetuates patriarchy and inequality in South Africa,” it said in a statement.

Facebook...

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1

and policy edicts are now regularly interspersed with streaming speeches, the national football team’s matches, the day’s most popular TV shows and patriotic songs, all stamped with a slick “SPM” (Samdech Prime Minister) logo.

The prime minister’s investment in online video content shows just how seriously he is taking a platform that he only embraced in September, when he announced that a Facebook page bearing his name was in fact his after years of denial.

It may also threaten the long-time Facebook supremacy of the opposition CNRP, which successfully used the platform to galvanize young voters in the run-up to the 2013 national elections. Opposition leader Sam Rainsy has been broadcasting daily news updates on his Facebook page ever since.

And while the CNRP has already launched online television stations to expand its audience online—attempts by the party to establish a terrestrial station have run into roadblocks it says are politically motivated—Mr. Hun Sen appears intent on getting ahead.

Speaking to graduating students of the Royal School of Administration in Phnom Penh yesterday, the prime minister bragged that viewers from as far away as Tokyo had streamed The Voice from his page.

“My Facebook will become a Facebook page and an online site,” he told the students, adding that Hang Meas HDTV had given his social media team permission to stream the show.

“Now we have [a] studio and also play songs,” he added. “My Facebook is a peaceful Facebook for development and joy, not a Facebook for insulting.”

The streaming content is the latest prong in what Mr. Hun Sen described in February as a new “electronic government” that uses “all networks—including the fastest network—to solve issues for citizens.”

Plans for an airport expressway and a driver’s license requirement for drivers of 125cc motorbikes were both scrapped after social

NEWSMAKERS

■ Actor ANTON YELCHIN, best known for playing the young Russian starship navigator Chekov in the rebooted series of “Star Trek” movies, was killed on Sunday when accidentally crushed by his own car against a driveway wall, police said. The Russian-born Yelchin, 27, died shortly after 1 a.m. after he apparently stepped out of his car in the steep driveway of his Los Angeles home and it rolled backward, said Jenny Houser, spokeswoman for the Los Angeles Police Department. “The car pinned him against a brick wall and a security fence, and that trauma led to his death,” Houser said. Yelchin was due at a rehearsal, and when he did not show up, friends went to his house and found him dead, Houser said. The accident was under investigation, she said. Yelchin was best known for assuming the role of Pavel Chekov, the young navigator for starship Enterprise, for the 2009 relaunch of the “Star Trek” film franchise (Reuters) media outcries earlier this year.

Opposition leader Sam Rainsy has for months accused Mr. Hun Sen of falsely bolstering his Facebook following by buying “likes” from “click-farms”—centers that create fake accounts to increase online popularity—in India and the Philippines, claims supported by statistics showing an inexplicable number of followers coming from those countries.

Asked about Mr. Hun Sen’s new streaming service on Facebook, Mr. Rainsy pointed to data from social media analytics site SocialBakers.com showing that less than 57 percent of the premier’s followers had accounts in Cambodia, compared to 82 percent for the opposition leader.

“The real competition rests on the substance of the programs’ content (not their breadth) and the values they carry,” Mr. Rainsy wrote in an email on Saturday. “I regularly publish historical, economic and social documents and analyses related to facts that the CPP does not want the public to know about.”

“Because through all kinds of politically-motivated bureaucratic harassment the CPP is blocking us in our building a traditional TV station, we are developing Internet TV programs with appropriate means,” Mr. Rainsy added.

Political blogger Ou Ritthy said that Mr. Rainsy and Mr. Hun Sen were clearly competing for the same young, tech-savvy audience.

“For young people in Cambodia, spending time to watch TV at home is like a traditional style as now most of them scroll to watch instant videos in their smartphones while they are with their friends, at work, [or] hanging out,” Mr. Ritthy wrote in an email on Sunday.

The prime minister’s social media team “tries to produce a lot of youthful contents and enthusiasm” in the hope it will translate into support in upcoming elections, he added.

Kounila Keo, a media consultant with a master’s degree from the Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy in Singapore, agreed.

“To me, this page is apparently being made into ‘a one stop shop for all things Cambodia,’” Ms. Keo wrote in an email yesterday. By experimenting with different types of content and engagement, Mr. Hun Sen “can test or find out whether social media such as Facebook can really sway public opinion towards him.”

However, social media strategy alone could only take the prime minister so far, she said. “What Cambodians...want to see are not just ‘nice regular or sophisticated posts’ but action [and] better policies towards business and trades, law enforcement, reduction in poverty and corruption.”

A clip from 'The Voice Cambodia' is shown on Prime Minister Hun Sen's Facebook page.

— International Brief —

US Court Rejects Challenge to Assault Weapon Bans

WASHINGTON - The U.S. Supreme Court yesterday left in place gun control laws in New York and Connecticut that ban assault weapons like the one used in last week’s massacre at an Orlando nightclub, rejecting a challenge brought by gun rights advocates. The court’s action underlined its reluctance to insert itself into the simmering national debate on gun control. The justices have not made a major gun rights ruling since 2010. The justices declined to hear an appeal of an October ruling by the New York-based 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that upheld laws prohibiting semi-automatic weapons and large capacity magazines in the two northeastern states. The laws in New York and Connecticut, among the strictest in the nation, were enacted after a gunman with a semi-automatic rifle killed 20 young children and six educators in 2012 at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newtown, Connecticut. The challengers had asserted that the laws violated the U.S. Constitution’s protection of the right to bear arms. (Reuters)